What are Cookies?

Nearly all websites use cookies. Cookies are small pieces of information which are stored as text files on a user’s device: computer, laptop, tablet or smartphone, when they visit an internet website utilising them. Cookies are not harmful to those devices. They are designed to hold very small amounts of data specific to a user and to track their movement around a website so that the operator can tailor the website for a user’s preferences to make each visit a better experience. Website operators often allow technology partners to set cookies, to determine things such as the type of device being used, as well as third party advertisers to tailor content for marketing purposes.

A user of a website can opt ‘out of’ cookies, block third party cookies, or disable acceptance of cookies in general via the settings on the internet browser they are using. As well as being useful for the user and website operator, some cookies can be essential for a website’s functionality and are utilised without a user’s consent, such as cookies that identify a user’s language preference, and those that maintain sessions between web pages. Blocking these cookies can therefore sometimes degrade the use of the website and users might even be logged out unexpectedly.

To find out more about cookies Users can use the Help menu on the web browser they are using or alternatively visit specialist information sites such as www.allaboutcookies.org.
